Dear Admissions Committee,

Having known Fu Tianyue for some time, I am more than delighted to recommend “Sunny” for undergraduate admission to your university. Never have I met a young person whose anglophone name better describes his cheerful character and concurrently his academic starlike prowess and qualities.

Our collaboration began in an unusual way. Although Mandarin Matrix was not actively recruiting, Sunny approached us independently with an email and his CV. We were immediately impressed by his background and self-taught technical skills, which matched the expertise we had long been seeking for an ambitious AI development project.

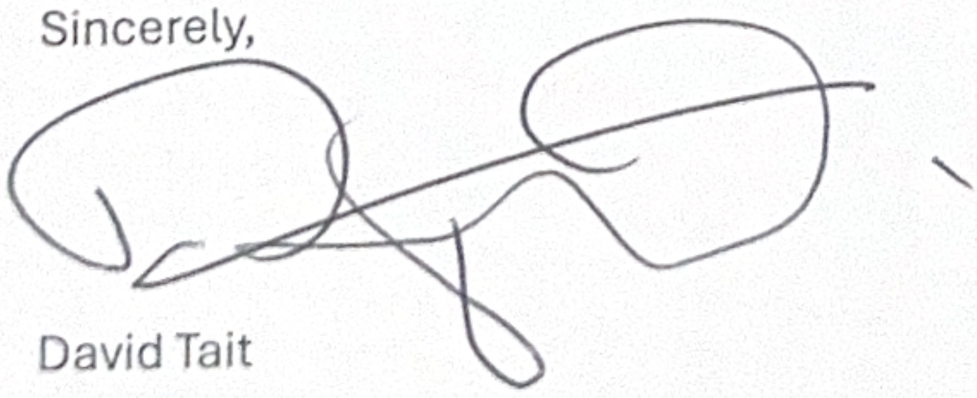

Despite having only recently graduated from secondary school, he has demonstrated a remarkable level of technical ability, initiative, and independence. He took on the development of a voice-driven digital avatar for our Chinese learning platform, designing the system architecture, creating a 3D animated character with lip-sync capabilities, integrating educational content into a database, and researching suitable technology providers.

He subsequently developed a more polished user-facing interface and worked closely with our team to refine the avatar's conversational functionality and user experience. Although the public-facing version is still in development, we have been consistently impressed by both the quality of his work and the exceptional speed at which he delivers results.

What stands out most is his ability to teach himself sophisticated technical skills and apply them effectively to real-world challenges. His intellectual curiosity, analytical thinking, and capacity for independent problem-solving are particularly impressive for someone at this early stage of his academic journey.

I have no doubt that Sunny will thrive in a challenging academic environment, and I wholeheartedly recommend him for admission.

Sincerely,

David Tait
